

Personality is the most important factor to consider when adopting a dog

Energy - here we measure physical and mental energy. Dogs with high energy tend to be very motivated and active. Dogs with low energy prefer a lazy life and won't go out of their way to keep entertained.

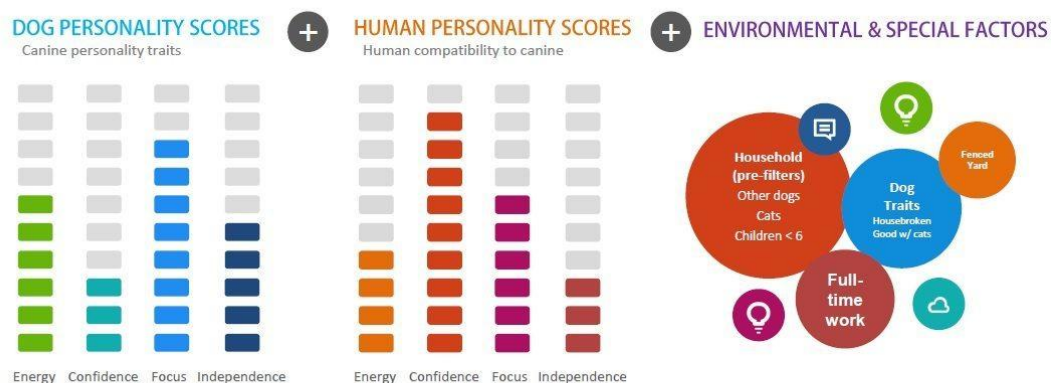

Is there anything better than binge watching your favorite show with your dog on your lap or at your feet? Do you want a dog close to you? Your Independence score will let you know.

Independence - Independence measures a dog's level of affection. Very independent dogs are happy with minimal physical contact; a glance or kind word makes them happy. Dogs with low independence thrive on being petted, giving kisses, and being in contact with someone as frequently as possible.

Focus - the Focus dimension measures a dog's ability to concentrate on a given task. High focus dogs are not easily distracted and are well suited for advanced training. A low focus dog is spontaneous in play and easily distracted.

Confidence - here we measure the dog's level of security. Dogs with high confidence confront new situations and people with no hesitation. Dogs with low confidence will need more guidance and reassurance in their daily life.

Matching Algorithm

4 core personality quadrants that align closely with a pet's personality. The human test completed by adopters

Maps to the 4 quadrants but considers a person's character as it pertains to their compatibility with a pet.

Additional considerations are built into the algorithm, such as household dynamics and daily lifestyle.

 PawLikeMe.com

https://online.king.edu/wp-content/uploads/2018/12/The-Learning-House-King-University-Dog-Psychology-101-R2_18-0404.jpg